Generating and gathering data on SGBV in times of disasters can be linked with the roll-out of the ASEAN Regional Guidelines on Violence against Women and Girls Data Collection and Use. In particular, the conduct of prevalence studies on violence against women and girls could include a sub-section on the incidence of SGBV in times of disasters.

National action plans on disaster risk reduction management and the empowerment of women and girls can clearly articulate the incidence of SGBV in times of disasters, and specific interventions through programmes such as the delivery of minimum/essential services to victims.

The information generated by the study can serve as the baseline. The study can be replicated in other ASEAN Member States. To monitor progress, another study can be undertaken after two or three years to determine if there have been any changes.
